who were responsible for the late sen sation in the Senate, have been censured for causing that scene, and the powers of the presiding officer of that body and the Senate itself are now to be defined so that when members are guilty of unseemly conduct or place themselves in contempt they can be summarily dealt with hereafter. The affair was unfortunate from beginning to end. Mr. Tillman erred in casting funuendoes and making charges which he admitted he could not prove (though they were generally believed by democrats) and so far forgot senatorial courtesy as to make them in the absence of his colleague at whom they were aimed. The assertions may or may not have been well-founded, but having uttered them he should have been prepared to produce the proof. On the other hand Mr. McLaurin was equally at fault, as the Senate was not the place to apply insulting epithets to his adversary, knowing, as he did, they would precipitate a personal rencontre. This was not all-there was a chapter of blunders. Mr. Frye strangely assumed that he had the power to eliminate from the rolls the names of two Senators from a sovereign State and egregiously erred in committing such a thoughtless act which forty-eight hours later he was compelled to recall. He did not reverse his action from the soul; he was compelled to adopt the opinions of others of superior judgment. The Tillman-McLaurin incident has about run its course as a nine-days wonder, and now that the storm is over and the atmosphere has resumed its normal serenity, it is hoped both may profit by the lesson-Mr. Tillman in acquiring more control of the "unruly member" which so often "setteth on fire the course of nature"-and Mr. McLauria in seeing the error of his way and returning to the fold from which he has in an evil moment strayed. Both should realize that they represent in the highest body in the land a State of historic renown, and that the people elected them as exponents of the political principles of the old Palmetto State.

By engagement President Roosevelt and Prince Henry then took a horseback ride despite the storm. Furing the whole ride which extended to Cabin John Bridge, the Prince, although soaked to the skin, never indicated that he was having anything but the best time of his life. He nodded friendly greetings right and left, and touched his cap wherever the German colors were encountered. There is hope that the convention may practically complete its work by March 15. The suffrage report will be the last one to be passed upon and the general impression seems to be that when that has been done the body will take a recess for several weeks, during which the committee on final revision will do its important work of revising the various articles so as to bring then nto harmony.

Then the convention will reassemble pass upon the work as a whole, and determine whether the constitution shall be submitted or proclaimed.

Judging from their actions, the managers of the Washington, Alexandria must have thought they were particu-larly interested in the safety of Prince Henry while passing through Alexandria, as they took the pains to send a messenger with orders to intercept the train at the intersection of Prince and Royal street; and thereby avoid the stop at the station on Royal street where quite a number of citizens, including many children, had congregated with the expectation of getting a gilmose at his Royal Highness. The writer does not know with whom tals wonderful forthought originated, and why such means should have been resorted to by those in authority to thus insult the citizens whose patronage they enjoy. I would suggest that they had better devote a little more time and energy in complying with their charter requirements as running of cars on certain streets, which have almost been abandoned,
